

Important things to remember about election pacts | Electoral Commission

Election Pacts You are in the Election Pacts section Home Election Pacts View the navigation tree Go to main guidance section: Election Pacts What does an election pact look like? Important things to remember about election pacts Which laws might apply? You want to enter a pact with Party B and you publicly announce this You are Party A and you enter a pact with Party B but do not announce it or campaign You are Party A and enter a pact with Party B, you announce it but you don't campaign You are party A and enter a pact with Party B, you announce it and then campaign You are one of several parties who are part of a large pact across several constituencies Important things to remember about election pacts There is nothing wrong with candidates and parties reaching this kind of agreement, however they need to observe the rules and ensure that any spending or donation given is properly reported. Agents need to authorise candidate spending. Where notional spending is being incurred, the candidate or their agent must make use of it for it to be notional spending. A registered political party can also be a registered non-party campaigner. A party who registers as a non-party campaigner will have to complete a separate return to report its non-party campaigner spending. Registered political parties cannot donate, via notional spending or directly to a non-party campaigner. You must ensure that any donation you receive as a non-party campaigner is from a permissible source. Last updated: 10 August 2021 Book traversal links for Important things to remember about election pacts What does an election pact look like? Which laws might apply?